

Tiffany Osburn, TX

Tiffany Osburn grew up in North Central Texas where she spent most weekends and summers on her family's small farm. More than anything, she loved spending time outdoors exploring the creek beds and woods around the property. Encouraged by her father, a retired army Colonel and history teacher, Tiffany began volunteering in the field of archeology as a teenager. Since 2008, Tiffany has served in her current role as Regional Archeologist for the Texas Historical Commission (THC) where she focuses on the preservation of historic Texas landscapes. Prior to joining THC, Tiffany earned a Master's Degree from the University of Denver where she conducted archeological research with a specialization in near-surface geophysics and worked for 10 years in the private sectors of cultural resource management and environmental compliance. Tiffany serves on the board of the Texas Archeological Society as the organizer for a large volunteer field excavation and educational opportunity each summer. Currently, she also serves as President of the Board of Directors for the Hill Country Land Trust, an organization that works with private landowners to conserve rural lands and wildlife habitat through voluntary conservation easements. Tiffany has focused her career and non-profit service on stewardship of cultural and natural resources and land conservation as a means of preserving our heritage. She currently lives in Dripping Springs, Texas where she enjoys outdoor adventures with her husband, Rob Stroup, and their dog Tig. Together, they look forward to hunting and fishing and contributing to wildlife conservation in their home state.
